Panicked by their poor economic performance and mounting worries about Turkey's prospects, Turks have moved their savings into cash-rich real estate, fueling a rapid increase in the volume of new mortgages. Rising interest rates and concerns about Turkey's economic prospects are driving more Turkish households to take out new mortgages. While mortgages are down from last year's peak, new housing loans by the Turkish household sector have risen by 6.3 percent to 554,500 loans, the state housing agency said in a quarterly report published Wednesday. Turkey's real estate industry has benefited from the surge in demand for rental properties. This in turn has been driven by the fears of Turkish households who worry about their shaky economy, which has already led to a rapid decline in the value of the Turkish lira against the U.S. dollar. The increase in mortgage lending may be fueled by concerns among investors about the stability of Turkey's economic performance, though mortgage rates remain low. After the crisis of the 1990s, when Turkey was hit by a currency crisis and financial crisis, credit has dried up in Turkey. Mortgages became difficult to obtain. But the problems plaguing Turkey, including weak economic growth, high inflation and a lira devaluation, have prompted more households to save and borrow money. The interest rates have also dropped to record lows in recent months. As of September, the average interest rates on loans for households stood at 3.55 percent for a term of one year, 3.62 percent for one to five years and 4.1 percent for a loan of six to ten years. While most households in Turkey save their money through deposits in their bank accounts, some of them now go for mortgages in order to get returns on their savings. So far, there are worries that Turkey's real estate market, which has boomed in recent years, may also suffer from the turmoil in the domestic economy. "Higher interest rates are clearly not the only reason for the rise in new mortgages,” said Mehmet Altay, an economist at Istanbul-based Fikirbank. “More and more Turkish households are also considering f988f36e3a
