DroidDraw Tutorial: Introduction The tutorial will guide you through the various steps in creating the finished GUI, with a bit of code in it. Step 1 The first step in DroidDraw is to choose the type of root layout for the project. For this example, we'll use a Linear Layout as the root element, though Table, Tab, Scroll View and Relative Layout are also possible. Step 2 Drag and drop the required widgets into the layout area. Step 3 Choose whether to use a single view (which can be implemented as a relative layout) or a tabbed UI. Tabbed UI is a useful option to have when you want to be able to add extra views and panels later on. If you need to add more views and elements later, it's useful to keep a single view. Step 4 Let's make the tabbed UI look a little different. We'll use a ButtonBar as a footer and a Button, which has been inflated from the downloaded Google Maps package, as a tabbed header. This gives the GUI a different look from the previous screen, and it's more professional. Add the required views/widgets. The top navigation bar will have labels for each tab, and a search field and a button for the home page. The menu tab will have three submenus, each of which can have a ListView with a small icon next to each element, or a button. Step 5 The second view will be a TableLayout with two rows. The first row will have three TextViews and a Button. The second row will have a couple of TextViews with their formatted text and two more TextViews. Add the required

Another requirement is the availability of Android SDK. Simple and intuitive interface There is no need to install the application because it works out of the box, as soon as the contents of the downloaded archive are extracted and the executable file is double-clicked. With straightforward looks that do not leave too much room for confusion, DroidDraw enables the user to add the desired interface elements from a set of widgets by simply dragging and dropping them in the layout screen. Drag and drop the desired objects There is the possibility to populate the area with regular buttons, check-boxes, radio buttons, loading icons and other elements, each customizable through a Properties panel. The root layout can be changed to linear, relative, table, tab host or scroll view. In each case the utility provides several options, such as customizing its size, background color, padding, visibility and margins. If a project is already available, the user can load it and continue personalizing it until the desired final form it attained. At the end of the process the tool can save the data as an Android layout file in XML, export it as APK or straight to an Android device.
