Avid Liquid 7 is a popular free software for video editing and has both a free and a paid.Q: What to do when you need to implement a function that is dependent on the same two variables, but only once at a time? For example, I want to implement a function like `findInsertionPoint(T) = InsertionPoint(T, d)` where `d` is either a minimal element of `T` or an element that violates the minimum property of `T`. So the function takes a type `T` and should return an insertion point for a new element, `T`. If `T` has a minimal element, it also returns the element of `T`. If `T` has no minimal element, `d` is returned. We can assume that each insertion point that is returned by the function has a well-defined insertion point value. I can see two ways to define the function: `InsertionPoint = (d, T) => { const min = minimum(T); return min || d; }` Doing this, I am checking first whether `d` is a value that is greater than the minimal element of `T`, and only if that is the case, I am returning the minimal element. `InsertionPoint = (d, T) => { const min = minimum(T); const`
